

Unleashing Eco-Critical Awareness: An Exploration of Environmental Degradation and Resilience in Ada Limón's The Leash

Samiya Raheem¹

¹ MA English, Department of English, University of Punjab, Lahore, Pakistan. Email: raheemsamiya786@gmail.com

ABSTRACT

This study looks into the thematic complexity of Ada Limón's poem "The Leash," investigating its link to eco-criticism and the human relationship with the natural world. This study uses a textual analysis methodology to find important themes such as environmental deterioration, human damage, and resistance. The study uses eco-critical theory to investigate the connections between literature and the physical environment, focussing on the poem's depiction of nature as a source of both destruction and resilience. This study adds to the developing subject of ecocriticism by highlighting the importance of literature in raising environmental knowledge and accountability.

ARTICLE HISTORY

Received 07 May, 2023
Revised 16 June, 2023
Accepted 21 June, 2023

KEYWORDS

Eco-criticism, textual analysis, the leash, physical environment

Introduction

The Ada Limón's The Leash serves as a poignant narrative that reflects humanity's destructive impulses, and the strength found in moments of compassion and connection. With striking imagery and a reflective tone, Limón conveys the environmental and social challenges of our current era. The poem's depiction of ecological degradation, human fragility, and delicate optimism aligns perfectly with eco-critical viewpoints, a literary framework that examines the interplay between literature and the environment. As a form of expression, poetry frequently acts as a reflection of cultural and ecological awareness, and Limón's work embodies this duality. Through its powerful images, such as the "hidden nowhere river" tainted by human actions, the poem becomes a contemplation of the relationship between destruction and rebirth, hopelessness and endurance. This essay delves into the thematic depth of The Leash by analyzing its connection to eco-criticism, emphasizing how Limón employs nature as both a representation of loss and a vehicle for resilience.

To investigate how Ada Limón's The Leash depicts environmental topics through an eco-critical lens, highlighting the interaction between destruction and resilience. This study contends that Ada Limón's poem 'The Leash' uses ecocritical themes and motifs to depict the terrible effects of human damage on the natural world, while simultaneously conveying a message of resilience and hope for environmental recovery.

This study on Ada Limón's poem The Leash adds significantly to the existing body of literature by emphasising the importance of environmental awareness and accountability, as well as providing a nuanced understanding of the intersections between literature and the environment through an eco-critical lens. The findings have important implications for literary interpretation, teaching practices, and cultural relevance, with the ultimate goal of inspiring a deeper appreciation for the natural world and raising environmental awareness.

Research Objectives

- To examine the use of imagery in The Leash to depict environmental destruction and resilience.

Research Questions

- How does Ada Limón use eco-critical images in The Leash to portray environmental harm and resilience?

CONTACT Samiya Raheem  raheemsamiya786@gmail.com.  Pakistan

© 2023 The Author(s). Published by ICSDR Group

This is an Open Access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited. The terms on which this article has been published allow the posting of the Accepted Manuscript in a repository by the author(s) or with their consent.

Literature Review

Eco-criticism, as a theoretical framework, has increasingly gained significance in the examination of literary works that address environmental themes. Scholars, including Lawrence Buell and Cheryll Glotfelty, contend that literature serves as a crucial medium for comprehending humanity's relationship with the natural world.

Buell (2005) posits that eco-critical literature frequently depicts nature as both a victim of human exploitation and a potential source of redemption. In her work, The Leash, Limón effectively captures this duality through her vivid portrayals of polluted rivers and resilient ecosystems.

Furthermore, Morton's Ecology Without Nature (2007) elaborates on this notion, suggesting that environmental literature often transcends the traditional boundaries between human and non-human entities; this concept is notably reflected in the poem's anthropomorphic representation of nature. Prior analyses of Limón's poetry, such as that conducted by McClure (2021), highlight her capacity to weave together personal and universal struggles, particularly in relation to environmental degradation. This examination positions The Leash within a broader context, delving into its thematic engagement with eco-critical issues.

Methodology

This study uses a textual analysis methodology that focusses solely on thematic exploration through an eco-critical perspective. The method entails a critical reading of the poem to uncover major themes such as environmental deterioration, human destruction, and resistance. Lines like "Perhaps we are always hurtling our body towards the thing that will obliterate us" are examined for symbolic relevance, emphasising humanity's destructive inclinations. The research also looks at how the poem's free-verse structure and imagery support its thematic issues. Primary textual evidence is reinforced by secondary eco-critical literature, ensuring a thorough examination of The Leash's relationship to ecological discourse. The merging of literary theory with textual data ensures a thorough and nuanced study.

Theoretical Framework

This analysis employs eco-criticism to explore the thematic structure of The Leash. Eco-criticism, as articulated by Glotfelty (1996), investigates the intersections between literature and the physical environment, offering critiques of anthropocentrism while emphasizing the repercussions of human activities on the natural world. Within the poem, the persistent motif of environmental degradation, exemplified by the line, "Even the hidden nowhere river is poisoned orange and acidic by a coal mine," serves as a poignant illustration of the eco-critical concern regarding ecological collapse. Furthermore, the poem reflects Morton's (2007) assertion that literature frequently positions humanity as inextricably linked to the natural world, a notion evidenced by the speaker's profound response to environmental damage. By portraying nature as a realm of both destruction and resilience, Limón highlights the eco-critical claim that literature acts as a call for environmental accountability.

Data Analysis

*After the birthing of bombs of forks and fear the frantic automatic weapons unleashed,
the spray of bullets into a crowd holding hands,
that brute sky opening in a slate metal maw that swallows only the unsayable in each of us, what's left? Even the hidden nowhere river is poisoned orange and acidic by a coal mine. How can you not fear humanity, want to lick the creek bottom dry, to suck the deadly water up into your own lungs, like venom? Reader, I want to say: Don't die. Even when silvery fish after fish comes back belly up, and the country plummets into a crepitating crater of hatred, isn't there still something singing? The truth is: I don't know.
But sometimes, I swear I hear it, the wound closing* *like a rusted-over garage door, and I can still move my living limbs into the world without too much pain, can still marvel at how the dog runs straight toward the pickup trucks break-necking down the road, because she thinks she loves them, because she's sure, without a doubt, that the loud roaring things will love her back, her soft small self alive with desire to share her goddamn enthusiasm, until I yank the leash back to save her because I want her to survive forever. Don't die, I say and we decide to walk for a bit longer, starlings high and fevered above us, winter coming to lay her cold corpse down upon this little plot of earth.

Perhaps we are always hurtling our body towards the thing that will obliterate us, begging for love from the speeding passage of time, and so maybe, like the dog obedient at my heels, we can walk together peacefully, at least until the next truck comes.*

Ada Limón's The Leash tells a realistic story of environmental and cultural collapse, interspersed with moments of survival. The remark, "Even the hidden nowhere river is poisoned orange and acidic by a coal mine," exemplifies eco-critical worry about environmental destruction. Here, the river represents both the harm caused by industrialization and the greater ramifications of humanity's disrespect for nature. According to Buell (2005), such imagery is consistent with eco-critical narratives that portray nature as a victim of human exploitation while also serving as a mirror for society's shortcomings. The theme of violence is further developed by depicting societal harm: "the frantic automatic weapons unleashed, the spray of bullets into a crowd holding hands." This contrast of connection and destruction reinforces the interdependence of humans and environmental disasters. Morton's (2007) idea of ecological interconnectedness emphasizes this relationship, arguing that environmental degradation inevitably reverberates throughout human groups.

Despite its dark tone, the poem has glimmers of hope and endurance. The speaker's plea: Do not die. Even when silvery fish after fish comes back belly up indicates a determination to survive against all obstacles. This is consistent with eco-critical approaches, which emphasise the possibility of renewal in the midst of catastrophe. The anthropomorphic depiction of the dog going towards danger, because she thinks she loves them, serves as a metaphor for humanity's careless involvement with damaging systems. The speaker's act of constraint, I yank the leash back to save her, represents an attempt to shift humanity's course towards sustainability. The poem concludes with existential and ecological reflections: Perhaps we are always hurtling our body towards the thing that will obliterate us. This sentence emphasizes the inevitability of environmental damage within current paradigms, but the picture of walking 'peacefully, at least till the next truck comes' provides a flimsy notion of coexistence. The Leash exhibits the eco-critical claim that literature has the ability to both critique and encourage change.

Ada Limón's The Leash is a highly thoughtful novel that connects the personal and the ecological, offering a poetic reflection on environmental degradation and survival. Limón depicts the disastrous effects of humanity's actions on the natural environment with vivid images and sophisticated metaphors, while simultaneously hinting at weak glimmers of hope. This research looks at how Limón uses eco-critical imagery to emphasise both humanity's ecological imprint and nature's ongoing capacity for rebirth, firmly placing the poem within the eco-critical discourse.

The poem begins with stark imagery of violence and turmoil, depicting a world in which human actions cause havoc not just in society but also in the environment. The remark, Even the hidden nowhere river is poisoned orange and acidic by a coal mine, exemplifies industrialization's detrimental impacts on the environment. The river, a symbol of life and continuity, is poisoned, having lost its natural energy due to human avarice and negligence. The word hidden nowhere implies that no location is immune to environmental degradation, emphasising the widespread impact of ecological devastation. Lawrence Buell's concept of eco-criticism emphasises how literature raises awareness of humans' relationship with the environment. In Limón's representation, the river does not simply reflect the physical devastation perpetrated by humans activity, but also serves as a metaphor for the loss of innocence and purity in the natural world.

4 Samiya Raheem

The poem's concern with environmental deterioration extends to its depiction of wildlife. Limón concludes: Even when silvery fish after fish comes back belly up. The picture of dead fish surfacing in filthy waterways elicits an emotional response, representing the breakdown of aquatic ecosystems. This is consistent with Timothy Morton's claim that ecological literature frequently forces readers to confront the tangible effects of environmental degradation (Morton, 2007). The fish's description as silvery adds a depth of poignancy, as their innate beauty contrasts sharply with their lifelessness. By focussing on these concrete instances of destruction, Limón encourages readers to consider the long-term consequences of humanity's ecological footprint.

Among the picture of destruction, Limón presents moments of resistance and renewal, albeit frail and transitory. The sentence, But sometimes, I swear I hear it, the wound closing like a rusted-over garage door, expresses the conflict between despair and recuperation. The metaphor of a wound closing represents nature's ability to heal, even in the face of relentless harm. The analogy to a rusted-over garage door dampens this optimism, implying that rehabilitation is gradual, flawed, and marred by scars. This duality is consistent with Cheryll Glotfelty's eco-critical approach, which emphasises the tension between acknowledging environmental catastrophes and envisioning paths to restoration (Glotfelty 1996).

Another moving passage in the poem depicts the dog going into danger: because she thinks she loves them, because she's sure, without a doubt, that the loud roaring things will love her back. The dog's naive belief in the roaring things serves as a metaphor for humanity's erroneous relationship with destructive forces. The speaker's gesture of drawing back the leash, because I want her to survive forever, represents intervention and care, demonstrating humanity's ability to change course and prioritise preservation. This is consistent with eco-criticism's call for proactive environmental stewardship, as advocated by Ursula Heise, who emphasises the role of literature in instilling ecological consciousness.

The poem's eco-critical ethos is encapsulated in the line, Perhaps we are always hurtling our body towards the thing that will obliterate us, begging for love from the speeding passage of time. This statement captures the existential tension between humanity's self-destructive tendencies and its desire for meaning and connection. The picture of hurtling towards obliteration emphasises the severity of ecological issues, yet the speeding passage of time conjures the fleeting opportunity to undo harm. By placing mankind inside this time framework, Limón emphasises the connection of ecological and existential challenges.

Ultimately, The Leash is both a condemnation of environmental damage and a testimonial to nature's resiliency. Limón's eco-critical artwork emphasises the disastrous consequences of human actions while simultaneously giving a cautious hope of renewal. The poem's evocative pictures of filthy rivers, dead fish, and damaged landscapes push readers to confront the real-world repercussions of environmental deterioration. At the same time, moments of sensitivity and care reveal that, while challenging, change is yet possible. The Leash shows poetry's ability to grapple with ecological concerns and stimulate thinking and action by connecting sorrow with optimism.

The phrase, the brute sky opening in a slate metal maw that swallows only the unsayable in each of us, expresses the immense power of devastation. The brute sky anthropomorphises nature, changing it into an unforgiving force that reflects human aggression. The "slate metal maw" is a metaphor for industrialism's eating of humanity's intangible traits such as hope, connection, and empathy. This is consistent with Morton's claim in Ecology Without Nature that industrial civilisation isolates humans from their surroundings, substituting harmony with exploitation.

The speaker's existential sorrow may be felt in the query, "How can you not fear humanity, want to lick the creek bottom dry, to suck the deadly water up into your own lungs, like venom?" The creek, contaminated by human activities, becomes a portent of doom. The desire to "suck the deadly water" expresses a desire to internalise and embody the suffering caused to nature, emphasising the interdependence of human and environmental misery. According to Buell (2005), such imagery shocks readers with the moral weight of environmental devastation, requiring them to acknowledge their complicity.

Despite the overwhelming misery, Limón gives a glimmer of hope in Isn't there still something singing? The phrase something singing is purposefully ambiguous, allowing readers to interpret it as a sliver of resilience in a broken world. This subtle optimism is consistent with Glotfelty's eco-critical theory, which holds that literature can influence change by portraying hope as a necessary antidote to despair.

Conclusion

Ada Limón's The Leash is an engrossing eco-critical examination of humanity's destructive inclinations and its tenuous prospects for recovery. The poem emphasises the interdependence of human and ecological issues by weaving themes of environmental deterioration and human resilience together. Limón challenges humanity's impact on environment with vivid imagery, such as the poisoned river and the dog's innocent delight, while also offering rays of optimism. This balance of despair and perseverance supports the eco-critical claim that literature may be used to understand and address environmental issues.

Disclosure Statement

No potential conflict of interest was reported by the author(s).

References

- Ahmed, S. (2020). Eco-Critical Poetics in Contemporary Literature. HarperCollins.
- Buell, L. (2005). The Future of Environmental Criticism. Blackwell.
- Banerjee, S. (2019). Environmental Hope in Modern Poetry. Cambridge University Press.
- Glottfelty, C. (1996). The Ecocriticism Reader. University of Georgia Press.
- Heise, U. K. (2008). Sense of Place and Sense of Planet. Oxford University Press.
- Limón, A. (2018). The Carrying. Milkweed Editions.
- McClure, A. (2021). Emotional Landscapes in Modern Verse. Oxford University Press.
- Morton, T. (2007). Ecology Without Nature. Harvard University Press.
- Roy, D. (2020). Eco-Critical Narratives and Modernity. Palgrave Macmillan
- Welling, B. (2017). The Symbolism of Nature in 21st-Century Poetry. Routledge.